

Grace Muller

Carman Romano

Feeling Greece and Rome

April 26th, 2026

Running, Pursuing, Dancing, Moving: An Examination of Movement As It Relates to Dual-Natured Desire in the Poetry of Sappho et Alcaeus

In her book Emotional Communities in the Early Middle Ages, Barbara Rosenwein defines her concept of an “emotional communities” as “groups in which people adhere to the same norms of emotional expression and value-or devalue-the same or related emotions” (Rosenwein 2). It is “a group in which people have a common stake, interest, values, and goals” (Rosenwein 24). These emotional communities exist in a variety of formats; an example Rosenwein herself presents in her text is the emotional community between sixth-century poet Venantius Fortunatus and his various patrons. They shared a desire amongst themselves to prioritize intense emotion, “annoying” thoughts that the at the time pope, Pope Gregory the Great, thought only distracted believers from their goal of entering the City of God (Rosenwein 128). She illustrates as well the community surrounding Columbanus, a sixth-century Irish monk, which prioritized a “restrained emotional character” (Rosenwein 132). These are examples very relevant to Rosenwein’s middle ages-centric book, but an emotional community can really be anywhere— it could be your classroom, your family, or your group of friends. These communities are fluid; as Rosenwein tells us, “ more than one emotional community may exist-indeed normally does exist-contemporaneously, and these communities may change over time. Some come to the fore to dominate our sources, then recede in importance” (Rosenwein 2).

As long as these groups are tied together by shared emotional norms and values, they can be considered emotional communities.

In writing on emotional communities, I feel it's important to acknowledge that the term emotions is, as Rosenwein puts it, "a convenience: a constructed term that refers to affective reactions of all sorts, intensities, and durations" (Rosenwein 4). As I'll be applying Rosenwein's theoretical framework, I find it apt that I write according to her evaluation of the word, and by extension also use words like passions and feelings as equivalents in my writing. As Eros features so heavily in this essay, I'll be frequently using words like desire, passion, Eros, love, all to mean the same emotion(s), that being erotic and romantic desire.

Emotional communities have existed across time, from the early middle ages into modernity, but my goal is to place us in a time far earlier than that. I'd like to propose the existence of an emotional community existing in the seventh century BCE between the Lesbian lyric poets, Sappho and Alcaeus. Sappho is— even to the non-academic— a symbol of Greek poetry, but fewer are aware of her male contemporary. Like Sappho, Alcaeus was born on Lesbos in the seventh century (Swift 275), and— like Sappho— his compositions consist of lyric poems meant to be performed (Swift 275). The similarities between the two run deep; There is such overlap in their style, their vocabulary, and their subject matter that it is sometimes impossible for scholars to discern which fragments should be attributed to which poet. Forty-two of these incerti auctoris fragmenta sit at the end of Eva Maria Voigt's Sappho et Alcaeus: Fragmenta. The two are widely considered to be contemporaries of each other, and there's a few pieces of evidence that suggests they met in person. The first is a "red-figure kratêr in the shape of a kalathos" (Rösler 65) depicting the two poets mingling together, and the second is a poetic interaction in the first book of Aristotle's Rhetoric (Rösler 65). Another piece of textual evidence that implies that the two did know each other in some capacity comes in the form of a woman named Abanthis. Sappho writes,

. . . task . . . lovely face . . . unpleasant . . . otherwise winter . . . pain(less?) . . . I bid you, Abanthis, take (your lyre?) and sing of Gongyla, while desire once again flies around you, the lovely one²—for her dress excited you when you saw it; and I rejoice: for the holy Cyprian³ herself once blamed me for praying . . . this (word?) . . . I wish . .
 . (Sappho 73)

Abanthis appears to be one of the girls in Sappho's "female circle, whose members were young girls being educated in musical and other skills before marriage" (Bing and Cohen 76). Quite interestingly, Alcaeus mentions Abanthis by name in a fragment of his as well, writing,

. . . Aphrodite. . . loosened . . . to you, apple-cheeked girl. . . of women . . . (winds) blowing through . . . to dance, lovely Abanthis: . . .
 col, ii
 . . . splendid . . . altar . . . blue (enamel?) . . . silver . . . gold. . . (Alcaeus 331)

It would be an incredible coincidence for there to be two women, both of whom are friends with lyric poets, and both of whom live on Lesbos—I'm going to assume here, then, that they're referring to the same woman, which would place Sappho and Alcaeus in essentially the same social circle. Coupled with the evidence presented by Rösler, a strong case is made for Sappho and Alcaeus to have met and dabbled in the same social communities. This is a community that processes emotions—particularly the emotion of Eros, of desire—in a very particular way.

But before continuing to delve further into the text in order to explore that way, I'd like to zoom in on an important aspect of emotional communities as explained by Rosenwein. These emotional communities need not actually exist in physical space; while many are, Rosenwein also posits the idea of a textual emotional community. She writes that these textual communities are “created and reinforced by ideologies, teachings, and common presuppositions” (Rosenwein 25). She calls on Foucault to describe these groups as having “shared vocabularies and ways of thinking that have a controlling function, a disciplining function” (Rosenwein 25). They consist of “internalized norms that determine how we think and act and that may be different in different groups” (Rosenwein 25). Since we can only experience Sappho and Alcaeus through the text of their poetry (and even then, we’re really only experiencing their poetic personae rather than their true selves), I’m performing this analysis largely through the lens of Rosenwein’s textual emotional community, keeping particularly in mind shared vocabulary, ideologies, and themes. I’m essentially attempting to reverse engineer the values of this proposed emotional community by examining how they treat emotions within the texts they produce.

Aside from the emotional community I’m arguing exists between poets on Lesbos, Sappho and Alcaeus are indeed a part of what I would classify as larger textual emotional community based on a common thread seen throughout Greek lyric concerning Eros: Eros is a complex, paradoxical being that is both good and bad—bitter and sweet, some would say—that has the capability to instantaneously overpower mortal human beings. Many poets, from Anakreon—who is knocked by Eros “with his huge hammer” (Carson 7)—or Sappho’s poetry is actually a prime example of this concept. She writes,

Eros once again limb-loosener whirls me

sweetbitter, impossible to fight off, creature stealing up (Carson 3)

Here we see Eros portrayed with two opposing descriptions smashed into one; he is both bitter and sweet, along with being able to completely overpower Sappho such that he is “impossible to fight off. She also writes, for me, neither the honey nor the bee (Bing and Cohen 231)

The authors of Games of Venus claim that “the sense [of the fragment] seems to be that the speaker wants neither love's sweetness nor its bitter sting” (Bing and Cohen 81), and it is very much in line with the rest of Sappho's poetry. Sappho, as Carson writes in Eros Bittersweet, Eros is “at once an experience of pleasure and pain...contradiction and perhaps paradox” (Carson 3).

This sentiment is the same for Alcaeus. Although his poetry takes on a much different subject matter than Sappho— for his poems largely concern drinking and politics rather than passion and desire— he too wrote about Eros in this paradoxical, bittersweet way. When writing on Theocritus, one Scholar claims that “Alcaeus made Eros the son of Iris and Zephyrus” (Alcaeus 369). This is an uncharacteristically tame origin for Eros. Hesiod, for example, writes of Eros as one of the primordial deities, “the most beautiful of all the deathless gods, who relaxes the limbs and overwhelms the mind and wise counsel in the breasts of all the gods and men” (Powell 100); his presence in the foundation of the universe, as an extremely powerful force, is ominous and unsettling. Being born of the messenger goddess Iris and the spring-heralding West Wind feels far more tame, almost sweet. Alcaeus does not shy away from the bitterness of Eros, however. He writes,

. . . and excited the heart of Argive Helen in her breast; and crazed by the Trojan man, the deceiver of his host, she accompanied him over the sea in his ship, leaving in her home her child (desolate?) and her husband's bed with its rich coverlet, (since) her heart persuaded her (to yield?) to love (through the daughter of Dione?) and Zeus . . . many of his brothers (the dark earth?) holds, laid low on the Trojans' plain for that woman's sake, and many chariots (crashed?) in the dust, and many dark-eyed (warriors) were trampled, and (noble Achilles rejoiced in?) the slaughter. . . (Alcaeus 333)

This “craze that Alcaeus references in this fragment is undoubtedly the insanity that comes along with Eros, especially given the references to love and Helen’s excited heart. Alcaeus claims here that Helen’s desire is the direct cause of the slaughter and death that occurred during the Trojan war. Desire has brought unimaginable death and destruction unto the earth. Through these fragments, Alcaeus displays this “bittersweet” Eros present in the work of other lyric poets.

One might be quick to dismiss these feelings of bittersweet desire as simply conventions of the lyric genre. In writing about emotional communities, Rosenwein admits that this is a problem as well. She questions, “might not the well-meaning historian mistake a particular genre, with its rules of expression, for an ‘emotional community?’” (Rosenwein 27). However, even if emotional elements of a text are common conventions of a genre, does that not tell us about how those emotions are perceived in that emotional community? Textual emotions are still “real” emotions, as someone had to conceive of them for them to be written onto the page. Rosenwein agrees with this sentiment, asking her reader, “...as composed texts, are [literary works] not very far from ‘real’ emotions, communicating them (at best) via a distorting ‘second hand?’ ...Finally, are texts not full of topoi, repeated commonplaces derived from other places, sources, and eras? What can topoi tell us about real feeling?” (Rosenwein 27). In short, my answer to the question of genre is to ask, if the writers writing these texts are expressing some sort of emotion, does it even matter? We’re already learning everything we know about these poets and their lives via the poetic personae they choose to put forth in their own writing, and to derive information about how people treat feelings in life through how they treat their feelings in their written work is no different. Through this analysis of Sappho and Alcaeus in context with other lyric poets, we can derive that their fellow Greeks— at least, those who consumed this very popular genre of poetry— had a similarly “bittersweet” perception of Eros, and thus erotic and romantic desire.

Sappho and Alcaeus are undoubtedly a part of this emotional community of lyric authors who perceive desire as bittersweet, but— as I alluded to previously— Sappho and Alcaeus form their own sort of community within the larger lyric system. If we imagine Rosenwein’s image of multiple emotional communities existing within one another as “a large circle within which are smaller circles, none entirely concentric but rather distributed unevenly within the given space” (Rosenwein 24), the larger lyric community would be the larger circle, with Sappho and Alcaeus and their Lesbian community existing within the smaller circle. This smaller community is formed based on their own unique perception of Eros as not just bittersweet, but a perpetually moving object; they portray the fleeting nature of desire through physical movement through the poetic space.

Let’s first take a look at one of Sappho’s more well-known fragments, fragment 1. In this poem, Sappho calls out to Aphrodite to deliver her from the anxieties that come from her desire for another woman. She writes, Ornate-throned immortal Aphrodite, wile-weaving daughter of Zeus, I entreat you: do not overpower my heart, mistress, with ache and anguish, but come here, if ever in the past you heard my voice from afar and acquiesced and came, leaving your father’s golden house, with chariot yoked: beautiful swift sparrows whirring fast-beating wings brought you above the dark earth down from heaven through the mid-air...

‘Whom am I to persuade this time to lead you back to her love? Who wrongs you, Sappho? If she runs away, soon she shall pursue; if she does not accept gifts, why, she shall give them instead; and if she does not love, soon she shall love even against her will...' (Sappho 55 1-9, 13-24) (My emphasis)

As is evident, this fragment is full of movement-related language. Desire, notably embodied here by Aphrodite instead of Eros, is constantly coming and going between Sappho and her home above with her fellow divine. This language is extended from Aphrodite to the object of Sappho's affections, as the woman runs to and from Sappho and her desires. To be experiencing desire is to constantly be going back and forth in relation to the object of your affections; the relationship depicted here feels like a sort of 'on-again, off-again' dynamic, so to speak. Sappho is portraying desire as something which itself is fleeting, in Aphrodite's movement, but also as something that affects the movement of those who are experiencing it, in the movement of the woman referred to in the poem. Desire is also leading Sappho, implying that, in some sense, desire snatches your agency away. Being in love is like being in some sort of whirlwind that whips you this way and that, without your say in the matter. Overall, Sappho uses this movement to comment on the changing, fleeting, whirling quality of desire.

Another example of this movement-focused language can be seen in Sappho fragment 16, where Sappho, similarly to the Alcaeus fragment I cited before, writes about Helen and the Trojan war. She says that

Some say a host of cavalry, others of infantry, and others of ships, is the most beautiful thing on the black earth, but I say it is whatsoever a person loves. It is perfectly easy to make this understood by everyone: for she who far surpassed mankind in beauty, Helen, left her most noble husband and went sailing off to Troy with no thought at all for her child or dear parents, but (love) led her astray . . . lightly . . . (and she?) has reminded me now of Anactoria who is not here; I would rather see her lovely walk and the bright sparkle of her face than the Lydians' chariots and armed infantry... (Sappho 67) (My emphasis)

We see a whole host of movement-related language here as well; Helen is led away from Sparta to Troy by love. Through this language, Sappho is trying to explain just why love is so beautiful via the moving image of Helen. Love is so compelling, so beautiful, that it has the power to stir even the most beautiful woman in the world into movement, causing her to leave behind everything she's ever known. Movement is inherent to desire; even as Sappho imagines another woman she'd like to see, it is her lovely walk she imagines first. Just as in the previous fragment, Sappho is using language of movement here to process her feelings regarding love.

If we return to the Alcaeus fragments touched on before, we can see a similar trend. In his poem concerning Abanthis, he writes that Aphrodite "loosened" lovely, apple-cheeked Abanthis, to dance (Alcaeus 331). Desire here, personified in Aphrodite, is provoking movement within Abanthis; the emotion of desire is causing movement. In his musings on Helen, too, he writes that she "accompanied him over the sea in his ship, leaving in her home her child (desolate?) and her husband's bed with its rich coverlet, (since) her heart persuaded her (to yield?) to love (through the daughter of Dione?) and Zeus" (Alcaeus 333). Again, we see love— this time within Helen's heart, but the difference is the same— directly spurring on movement.

There are, in addition to these previous examples, more instances of this shifting desire. Alcaeus writes,

That was a very (foolish) idea of . . . to (appease?) Love; but . . . when the city perished thanks to king Zeus, son of Cronus . . . (they) died and went to the house of Hades.

Without them no labour (prosper?), but all (is ruined?) . . . fine things, and he (mixed) good with evil... Was he not worthy to be flayed like a lion? (Alcaeus 335) (My emphasis)

While this poem initially may appear too fragmentary to parse out meaning from, there are references to Helen and the nature of desire hidden within. Love is mentioned outright, followed by a city being destroyed at the hands of Zeus. This is the same situation that befell the city of Troy; The Trojan war was spurred on by the desires of Helen, as we've discussed at length, but Troy's fall was also at Zeus' will, for it was at Zeus' command that the judgement of Paris occurred. Apollodorus writes that "Strife threw an apple as a prize of beauty to be contended for by Hera, Athena, and Aphrodite; and Zeus commanded Hermes to lead them to Alexander on Ida in order to be judged by him" (Apollodorus 173). All is then ruined, of course, by Helen's desires, just as Alcaeus expresses in his other Helen-centric fragment. The "mixing good with evil" is indicative of the dual nature of Eros as expressed by Alcaeus and the other lyric poets. So, overall, we have a fragment here regarding the fall of Troy and its origins in Helen's desires— but there's also movement present here! The desire felt by Helen, in leading to the fall of Troy, indirectly killed many people, whom I posit are the "they" that died and then moved physically through the world in traveling to the house of Hades. Once again, we see desire being very closely linked to movement through space. As is evident, the feeling of desire in the poetry of Alcaeus is emotionally processed and squared away through movement-based language. Desire is, to Alcaeus as well (even as a poet whose main focus isn't erotic or romantic desire), a constantly changing and moving emotion.

This changing quality of desire is understood by Alcaeus to be present whether we're looking at the sweet side or the bitter side of Eros. Alcaeus 42 encapsulates this sentiment; Alcaeus writes,

As the story goes, because of evil deeds bitter grief came once to Priam and his sons from you, Helen, and Zeus destroyed holy Ilium with fire. Not such was the delicate maiden whom the noble son of Aeacus, inviting all the blessed gods to the wedding, married, taking her from the halls of Nereus (Alcaeus 257) (My emphasis)

While this fragment doesn't explicitly refer to desire as an emotion, the desire is implied through the inclusion of Helen, as Alcaeus has already spent ample time writing about Helen and her desire which caused the fall of Troy. The "evil deeds" that Alcaeus writes come from Helen are then the aftermath of the judgement of Paris and the deeds committed during the war itself. Thus, the bitter grief moving towards and into Priam are a direct results of the desires that Alcaeus has attributed to Helen. Contrary to this bitter grief, Alcaeus writes about the wedding of Peleus (son of Aeacus) and Thetis (daughter of Nereus). Through this wedding, which is not at all like the bitter and grief-filled marriage of Helen, will presumably spark a different, less destructive sort of desire, seeing as it's being compared in contrary to Helen. Desire has the potential to create both bitter and sweet marriages; it has the power to create along with the power to destroy. Alcaeus demonstrates both the dual nature of Eros within this fragment, but also the use of movement through space to process and interpret that paradoxical duality.

This language of movement is not seen in work written by other lyric poets. Games of Venus, which is itself is partially a compiling of fragments from many other lyricists, doesn't mention Helen at all (outside of the section on Sappho) in the context of lyric. When making reference to Aphrodite, other lyricists do not have her moving through space, from place to place (or directly sparking movement in others such as Helen), as Sappho and Alcaeus do— so, clearly it's not some sort of genre-related convention. Writing about love and desire through language of active movement is something unique to Sappho and Alcaeus, hence why I have proposed placing them together in their own Lesbian emotional community. While it may initially appear as if they are specifically using Helen and Helen-related imagery, I believe that her inclusion is a product of this fascination with movement, as invoking Helen is a very easy way to comment on movement as a direct product of desire (she is, after all, the one with the face that launched a thousand ships). While they interpret desire as a paradoxical, bittersweet entity, similarly to the other lyric poets, it is only the twin poets of Lesbos who interpret it as something that is actively moving, and which actively moves those who experience it. Sappho and Alcaeus exist in their own emotional community in which desire is interpreted, processed and written about via language of movement and travel, in order to most accurately depict desire's wild, fickle, fleeting nature. There is a sort of shared interest between them in describing desire in this way, a shared emphasis on the actively shifting quality of this emotion, which fits in line with Rosenwein's description of an emotional community as "a group in which people have a common stake, interests, values, and goals" (Rosenwein 24). This method of viewing desire as an emotion is a shared way of thinking that Rosenwein references in the context of textual emotional communities (Rosenwein 25).

This provides fascinating insight into how Sappho and Alcaeus— along with, possibly, the people around them on Lesbos— thought about desire. Even when it is productive, such as the case with the desire between Peleus and Thetis, desire is an inherently upending force. I've described the Helen-related imagery as a means to incorporate themes of desire sparking movement, but it also sheds light on how desire, in leading specifically to marriage, brings someone, a woman, from one house to the next. This is very closely tied to Sappho's life; her own female social circle was made up of "young girls being educated in musical and other skills before marriage" (Bing and Cohen 76). It can then be extrapolated that this movement-based language is then a manifestation of feelings surrounding marriage. Desire, leading to marriage, is a force that moves people throughout the world as they merge and create new families. This would also explain why Aphrodite appears so much more than Eros (as in the god who is the personified form of desire, not the feeling of desire itself) in the poetry of Sappho and Alcaeus—whether directly named, or implied through references to Helen and the Trojan war. Aphrodite is, as described by Hesiod, “the whisperings of young girls, and their smiles and deceptions, and sweet delight, and making love, and gentleness” (Powell 167). Aphrodite is an inherently feminine force, which is why she is called upon in her personified form far more than Eros is, which I’ve hopefully made clear with the fragments I’ve chosen to pull. This new perspective further nuances this emotional community; not only are the Lesbian poets particularly concerned with desire as it relates to movement, but with viewing desire as a disrupting (or, if looked at in a better light, changing) force based on how it leads to marriage. This isn’t inherently a bad thing; Alcaeus, after all, juxtaposes the presumed goodness of Thetis’ marriage with the bitter grief that comes out of Helen’s. However, when looking at the many references made to Helen and her second marriage in the texts of both poets, the use of such imagery in this way illuminates a sort of anxiety surrounding desire, marriage, and its capacity to lead entire nations to militaristic and political ruin.

My proposed model of emotional community is far from the first way that lyric (especially that of Sappho and Alcaeus) has been read, and so the question remains: what does the model of emotional communities give us that other methods of reading do not? Mueller’s “avuncular” model of Intertextuality, for example, allows us to “find common grounds between poets, rather than focusing exclusively on their latent rivalries” (Mueller Abstract), as she writes in Sappho and Homer: A Reparative Reading. She crafts an image of Homer and Sappho akin to that of an uncle and niece, allowing the reader to see a literary kinship between them that is devoid of “professional and personal” (Mueller 20) motivations. Similarly, through lyric citation and transmission as described by Tom Phillips in his chapter of A Companion to Greek Lyric, Methodologies and Techniques, we can analyze the reception of poems as they are transcribed and cited by others, illuminating the relevance and effect those poems had to their readers.

A model of emotional communities similarly connects different authors with each other, but in a very different way from the modes of reading described above. Emotional communities allow us a glimpse of the shared emotional framework that connects a group of people (rather than a single poet’s inspiration or citation). It enables us to view emotions as a shared cultural experience, rather than the lone cry of an individual. If we compare it to Mullers “avuncular” model of intertextuality, I’d describe this model of emotional communities as a “sibling” model in comparison—a humorous one to draw, seeing as Sappho and Alcaeus are often referred to as the twin poets of Lesbos (a reference to their stylistic similarities). Other methods of reading, while vitally important, do not offer us nearly as intimate a view of the authors whose texts we are reading and engaging with. Through our analysis of an emotional community, we’re able to reverse-engineer the emotional values and processes of that community, which models like intertextuality and transmission cannot. As for our exploration of Sappho and Alcaeus, this paper has shown how through illuminating the presence of an emotional community between these two poets—a community that is both textual and geographical, as while I have provided insight into their view of the emotion of desire via textual analysis, there also exists the implication that the two operated in-person as contemporaries within shared social circles—one can easily examine the language, themes, and ways of thinking that make different authors and works of literature incredibly distinct from one another. In addition to this, it’s allowed us to examine the anxiety these poets felt surrounding desire as it relates to marriage and possible political upheaval.

Applying Rosenwein's model of emotional community to these poems breaths a new life into the texts; we are now able to view the Lesbian poets— and the many girls they've watched get married off around them— as the thinking, feeling people that they were when they were alive, rather than simply words on a page. When referring to emotional communities in the early middle ages, Rosenwein writes that “the history of emotions helps us to see new dynamism in a historical period that seems otherwise largely stagnant” (Rosenwein 31). In examining Sappho and Alcaeus through their poetry in this way, we can engage with them as the people they were, rather than only the words they left behind.

Works Cited

- Apollodorus. The Library, Volume II: Book 3.10-end. Epitome. Translated by James G. Frazer. Loeb Classical Library 122. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1921.
- Bing, Peter, and Rip Cohen. Games of Venus : An Anthology of Greek and Roman Erotic Verse from Sappho to Ovid. New York: Routledge, 1991.
- Carson, Anne. Eros the Bittersweet: An Essay. 1st ed., vol. 129, Princeton University Press, 2014, <https://doi.org/10.1515/9781400857951>.
- Mueller, Melissa. Sappho and Homer : A Reparative Reading. 1st ed., Cambridge University Press, 2024.
- Powell, Barry B. "Theogony." The Poems of Hesiod: Theogony, Works and Days, and The Shield of Herakles, 1st ed., University of California Press, 2017, pp. 31–96. JSTOR, <http://www.jstor.org/stable/10.1525/j.ctv1xxt93.9>. Accessed 13 May 2026.
- Rosenwein, Barbara H. Emotional Communities in the Early Middle Ages. Cornell University Press, 2006.
- Rösler, Wolfgang. "Sappho and Alcaeus." The Cambridge Companion to Sappho. Ed. P. J. Finglass and Adrian Kelly. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2021. 65–76. Print. Cambridge Companions to Literature.
- Sappho, Alcaeus. Greek Lyric, Volume I: Sappho and Alcaeus. Edited and translated by David A. Campbell. Loeb Classical Library 142. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1982.
- Swift, Laura. A Companion to Greek Lyric. 1st ed., Wiley Blackwell, 2022.
- Voigt, Eva Maria. Sappho Et Alcaeus: Fragmenta. Athenaeum – Polak and Van Gennep. Amsterdam, 1971.

